West Virginia---Public schools are using a dance video game to help get students in shape. In these schools, students are often told to turn off their video games and get some exercise. The schools have found a new way for their students to work out while playing a new video game. West Virginia is one of the heaviest states in the country. About half of its fifth-graders are considered to be overweight, and their parents are worried about that. To get them moving on a healthier path, the state's public schools are using a video game called "Dance Dance Revolution".

To use the game, players should stand on a special mat in front of a TV screen. Following arrows on the screen, players must move their feet to the specific symbols on the mat. Players must move quickly, touching symbols on the mat at just the right time. With each song, they get more exercise. Some health care experts hope that the schools can get children to change their behavior at a young age in this way and grow up to be healthy and active adults.

West Virginia is ranked among the top three heaviest states. About a third of West Virginians are considered to be obese. Even more are considered to be overweight. Extra weight can lead to serious health problems such as high blood pressure, diabetes(糖尿病), some cancers, and many other health issues.

"One out of three children born in West Virginia today will have diabetes by the time they grow up," said Nidia Henderson, a manager for the public employees' insurance(保险) program. "That's a terrible thing and not acceptable."

All of West Virginia's 157 middle schools are using the video game. School officials hope that all public schools in the state will use the game within the next three years. However, officials emphasize that the game is not meant to substitute physical education and health classes. The game will be part of physical education classes and after-school programs.

People appear to be born to compute. Children’s numerical skills develop so early that it is easy to imagine an internal clock of mathematical maturity guiding their growth. Not long after learning to walk and talk, they can set the table with impress accuracy---one knife, one spoon, one fork, for each of the five chairs. Soon they know to place five knives, spoons and forks on the table and, a bit later, this amounts to fifteen pieces of silverware. Having thus mastered addition, they move on to subtraction. It seems almost reasonable to expect that if a child were secluded on a desert island at birth and retrieved (重新回来)seven years later, he or she could enter a second-grade mathematics class without any serious problems of intellectual adjustment.

Of course, the truth is not so simple. This century, the work of cognitive psychologists (认知心理学家) has shown the subtle(微妙的) forms of daily learning on which intellectual progress depends. Children were observed as they slowly grasped---or, as the case might be, bumped into---the concepts that adults take for granted, as they refused, for instance, to admit that quantity is unchanged as water pours from a short stout glass into a tall thin one. Psychologists have since stated that young children, asked to count the pencils in a pile, readily report the number of blue or red pencils, but must be coaxed (哄劝) into finding the total. Such studies have suggested that mathematics is mastered gradually, and with effort. They have also suggested that the very concept of abstract numbers---the idea of a oneness,a twoness, a threeness that applies to any class of objects and is a prerequisite(先决条件) for doing anything more mathematically demanding than setting a table-----is itself far from innate (天生的) .

69. Which of the following is true according to the work of cognitive psychologists?

A. Children’s intellectual progress doesn’t depend on their daily learning
B. Children learn the concepts of quantity slowly or by accident.
C. Children have almost the same sense in grasping the concept of quantity as adults do.
D. Children are ready to tell anything about numbers.

70. The studies suggested that _____.

A. Children have their numerical skills at birth.
B. Children develop their numerical skills very quickly as they grow up.

根据短文内容，从短文后的选项中选出能填入空白处的最佳选项。选项中有两项为多余

选项。

We are living in a world where people feel disconnected(分离的) from each other, because we have not yet learned to genuinely communicate. This is most obvious when two people have a conversation with each other. 71

To listen means to understand the meaning that lies behind words. 72 To feel connected with those around us, we need to start communicating on a deeper level. The basic and most important step to achieve this is by learning how to listen.

1. Desire to learn

73 To genuinely listen, we need to cultivate (培养) the desire to understand and care for what the other wants to say.

2. Keep an open mind

Sometimes, our opinions usually color the meaning of what others are trying to express. When listening to someone, leave your belief systems aside for a while and just keep an open mind.

3. Be receptive(善于接受的)

While engaged in a conversation, most of us are continuously interrupting others. 74 When having a conversation, stop trying to solve things out. Just listen!

4. Be patient

Usually, we are in such a hurry that we don't have the time to listen to each other carefully. From now on, when you are having a conversation, don't push it but just let it flow to squeeze the juice.

When you talk, you are only repeating what you already know. 75 238

- A. During a conversation, most people don't truly listen to what the other is saying.
- B. However, if you listen, you may learn something new.
- C. It means to be totally absorbed into what the other is trying to communicate.
- D. Listening broadens our horizons and helps exchange our ideas with others.
- E. Many times when someone is talking to us, we are just pretending to listen.
- F. Sometimes we truly want to focus our attention on what others are talking about.
- G. As a result, we never get to understand them.
