Two young women, Kiyoko Okamoto and Kozue Kamijo, gave up their office jobs in Tokyo to do volunteer (志愿者) work in the Philippines. They help children like Jephonie and other boys and girls try to make their dreams come true. For example, Jephonie must walk several kilometres from her home to the nearest school. And she always spends some of her school time doing farm work to help her family. If she is lucky, she will finish high school and "hopefully (有希望地) go to university". But she has nine brothers and sisters. They are hoping for the same thing.

The two volunteers have been working with those children in the education centre. They have sent three children to go to university. While they were helping the children go for further education, the two volunteers learned from them, too. They learned how to cook without a rice cooker, wash clothes without a washing machine, and how to live a simple life in a country far away from their own.

This kind of experience has helped them to become more independent (独立的). They say the local people have taught them some of the life's important lessons.
